Placed on throne by conspiracy forcing abdication of Paul. Gained some liberal ideas (1796–1800) from Frédéric C. de La Harpe, Swiss republican; began reign with sweeping reforms; made senate the supreme high court (1801); established ministries (1802); encouraged education and science. Joined coalition against Napoleon (1805); present at Austerlitz (1805); joined with Prussia but, after defeats (1807) of Eylau and Friedland, signed Treaty of Tilsit. Fought successful war against Turkey (1806–12); became rival of Napoleon, resulting in French invasion of Russia (1812); helped destroy Napoleon's army in retreat. Held strong position in Europe (1813–15); present at battles of Dresden and Leipzig (1813); entered Paris with allies (1814); took part in Congress of Vienna (1815); formed Holy Alliance (1815) and took part in conferences that followed it. Last years of reign (1820–25) marked by reactionary policies, embittered feelings, increasing popular discontent. Succeeded by his brother Nicholas I.

Alexander II. Russ. Aleksandr Nikolaevich. 1818–1881. Son of Nicholas I. Emperor (1855–81). Carefully educated and given military training; traveled in Germany; m. (1841) Maria, afterwards known as Maria Alexandrovna, daughter of Grand Duke Louis II of Hesse-Darmstadt. Signed Treaty of Paris (1856) terminating Crimean War. Had strong convictions for reforms; emancipated serfs (1861), his greatest achievement; reorganized army and government administration; established regular system of courts and founded schools. Put down Polish insurrection (1863–64); friendly to Germany in Franco-Prussian War (1870–71); waged war with Turkey (1877–78); extended boundaries of Russia in Caucasus and Central Asia (1868–81). Shortly after death of wife (1880), m. Ekaterina Dolgorukova. In spite of good done by his reforms, many added burdens placed upon peasants; certain repressive measures caused unrest; activity of Nihilists increased (1879–81); killed by bomb in St. Petersburg.

Alexander III. Russ. Aleksandr Aleksandrovich. 1845–1894. Son and successor of Alexander II. Emperor (1881–94). Became heir apparent on death (1865) of his elder brother Nicholas; m. (1866) daughter of Christian IX of Denmark (see MARIA FEDOROVNA). During years before accession (1865–81) showed open disapproval of some of father's policies; succeeded to throne on father's assassination; crowned (1883). Continued reactionary policies; countenanced persecutions, esp. of Jews; did not favor foreign influences, but himself interfered in affairs of Balkan states, esp. Bulgaria; continued Russian advance in Central Asia, even to frontier of Afghanistan (1884–85), bringing about crisis with England. Opposed any close union with Germany, but became virtual ally of France (1891–94); succeeded by his son Nicholas II.

Alexander. Russ. Aleksandr Mikhailovich. 1866–1933. Russian grand duke; brother-in-law of Emperor Nicholas II; m. (1894) Xenia (b. 1875), daughter of Alexander III. Their eldest daughter, Irina Aleksandrovna, married (1914) Prince Felix Yusupov, an assassin of Rasputin.

le Roux (fōōlk' lē rōō'), first count (888?-938); Fulk II (ruled 942-958); Geoffrey I, Fr. Geoffroi (ruled 958-987); Fulk III Ner'ra' (nē'rā') (c. 970-1040; ruled 987-1040); Geoffrey II Mar-tel' (mār-tēl'; Fr. mār-tēl') (1006-1060; ruled 1040-60); Geoffrey III (ruled 1060-67); Fulk IV le Ré'chin' (rā'shān') (ruled 1068-1109); Fulk V the Young, Fr. Foulques le Jeune (lē zhūn') (1092-1143; ruled 1109-29), later king of Jerusalem (1131-43), at war (1112-19) with Henry I, King of England; Fulk's son Geoffrey IV the Handsome, sometimes known as Geoffrey Plantagenet (1113-1151; ruled 1129-49), m. (1129) Henry I's daughter Matilda; their son Henry, count (1149), m. (1152) Eleanor of Aquitaine, adding Aquitaine to Anjou, and, on death (1154) of Stephen, King of England, recognized as his successor, first of English house of Anjou (Plantagenets).

SECOND HOUSE: Plantagenet kings of England, esp. first three: Henry II (ruled 1154-89), Richard I (ruled 1189-99), and John (ruled 1199-1216). Much English land in France lost by John to Philip II of France (1202-04); countship of Anjou attached to France. Other Plantagenets (q.v.) to Richard II (d. 1399) also called Angevins, but none after John were counts of Anjou.

THIRD HOUSE: Kings of Naples and Sicily. Anjou given (1246) by King Louis IX as appanage to his brother Charles, Count of Provence, later (1266-85) king of Naples and Sicily; succeeded as king by his son Charles II (1285-1309). Charles II had five children, from whom descended five different but interrelated lines of European rulers: (1) HUNGARY—from oldest son, Charles Martel (1272?-1295), king in opposition (1290-95) to Andrew III. Other members of line include Charles Robert, founder of Anjou line of Hungary (1308-42); Louis the Great, King of Hungary (1342-82), Poland (1370-82); and Mary (ruled 1382-95), who married Sigismund, later Holy Roman Emperor. (2) NAPLES—from second son, Robert; succeeded his father, Charles II, as king of Naples (1309-43); succeeded in turn by granddaughter, Joanna I, Queen of Naples (1343-82), who adopted Louis of Anjou (see 4, below). (3) NAPLES—from third son, John, Duke of Du-raz'zo (dōō-rāt'sōō). His grandson was Charles III, King of Naples (1381-86), succeeded by his son Ladislav (1386-1414) and daughter Joanna II (1414-35), with whom direct line became extinct. (4) FRANCE, ANJOU, AND NAPLES—from fourth child, Margaret; m. Charles de Valois (see CHARLES DE VALOIS). Their son Philip chosen (1328), as Philip VI, first king of France of House of Valois; countship united to crown. Philip succeeded by son John II (1350-64); countship raised to duchy (1360) and bestowed by John on his second son, Louis I, Count of Provence (1339-84) and Duke of Anjou (1360-84). Louis adopted by Joanna I as her successor to throne of Naples (1382-84); titular king only. Next two dukes also titular kings only: Louis II (reigned 1389-99) and Louis III (reigned 1417-34). Louis II's second son, René, married Isabella of Lorraine (see LORRAINE); king of Naples (1435-42) after death of Joanna II (see 3, above), but driven out by Alfonso I (see 5, below). René's daughter Margaret of Anjou (q.v.) married King Henry VI of England. (5) ARAGON AND NAPLES—from fifth child, Blanche; m. James II, King of Aragon. From them descended Alfonso V (1416-58), who as Alfonso I was king of Naples (1443-58). His natural son Ferdinand I succeeded as king of Naples (1458-94), followed by Alfonso II (ruled 1494-95) and Ferdinand II (ruled 1495-96), last of house of Anjou in Naples. Meanwhile,

Bur'gun-dy (bûr'gân-dî), Fr. Bour'gogne' (bôor'gôn'y'). Name of two ruling houses:

(1) Ducal house of Burgundy, a region in western central Europe which from 5th century to 15th had varying boundaries, was at different times a county, duchy, kingdom, etc., and was often divided, most of it becoming finally (end of 15th century) a part of France. Two lines of ducal house: (a) Capetian line (1032-1361), from Robert I (d. 1075), Duke of Burgundy, son of King Robert of France (996-1031), through eleven rulers to Duke Philippe de Rouvre [d' rû'vr'] (1345-1361; reigned 1350-61), with whose death the line became extinct. (b) Cadet line (1363-1477) re-established by John the Good, King of France (1350-64), whose mother, Jeanne de Bourgogne (1293-1348), was a daughter of Duke Robert II (reigned 1272-1305) of Burgundy (Capetian line). This second line comprised dukes of Burgundy at height of their power: Philip the Bold, founder, John the Fearless, Philip the Good, and Charles the Bold (see individual biographies; see also MARY OF BURGUNDY). On the death of Charles (1477), the duchy proper passed to France. Dukedom revived for Louis (1682-1712), dauphin of France, grandson of Louis XIV, and father of Louis XV.

(2) A dynasty of Portugal originating with Henry of Burgundy (1057-7112); grandson of Robert I, 1st Duke of Burgundy; appointed (1094) count of Portugal by his father-in-law, Alfonso VI of León and Castile; succeeded (1112) by his son Alfonso I, who made Portugal an independent kingdom (1139). There were nine kings of this dynasty (1139-1383): Alfonso I, Sancho I, Alfonso II, Sancho II, Alfonso III, Diniz, Alfonso IV, Pedro I, and Ferdinand I. Line became extinct with Ferdinand I (d. 1383) and was succeeded by the House of Aviz. See Table (in Appendix) for PORTUGAL.
